Outcome of the Program:

- The students Understand about a Planning and preparation,. Before starting an interview, it's important for a manager to have read the applicant's resume, prepared questions, and know what he wants to learn during the interview. It's also helpful to set a time limit for the interview.
- Understanding the job, In some cases, managers don't have direct experience doing the job for which they're hiring. When that happens, it's important for the manager to talk with people who are doing the job now as well as direct supervisors and teammates. What are the most important qualities, skills, and qualifications required for the job? Are there specific situations for which the new hire should be prepared? Knowing about the job makes it easier to ask the right questions.
- Connecting with the applicant, Most people are nervous at job interviews, and it's important to set the applicant at ease so they can put their best foot forward. Instead of just saying "Don't be nervous," good managers spend some time chatting with the candidate and explaining the interview process.
- Active listening, Managers want to learn about the candidate, so active listening is very important. Managers need to show that they're interested by nodding, asking follow-up questions, smiling, or otherwise using body language to encourage the candidate to share more information.
